

question: How did greece's geography affect the formation of culture answer: Greece is like a peninsula with many little islands scattered on the outside. The land was not good for farming, and fishing can only go so far, so the greek Traded. They would exchange goods from all around europe and asia. This led to the spread of cultural beliefs, holidays, and religions. Because the greek traded, they were also open minded. They didn't think they were the best, so they let in new ideas, inventions, and so on. Unfortunately, each city state was isolated, (all those islands) and the citizens of greece were constantly engaged in civil wars, as there was not feeling of national unity.
